You could see our town from that ridge, as well the silver string of the creek and the dark swath of the forest. Kyle was halfway up the huge lightning-blasted pine that crowned the ridge. There was a long, thick branch about twenty feet up, easy to climb to, and we frequently sat on that branch together, his back to the trunk, my back to his ...

He jammed on the brakes, spinning the car into a sideways skid on the dirt road leading to our houses. Kyle twisted in the leather bucket seat, one arm braced on the headrest of my seat, brown eyes blazing. "What did you just say?" He sounded angry, which confused me. "Cause I could have sworn you just said Jason asked you out.
